I'm trying to portray a friendly, well-meaning monk as the player character in my local games, and this has been a problem. The question is, what's a good, friendly, and well-meaning monk look like? In an attempt to answer this question, I've reached out to the various D&D Beyond user communities I'm involved with and asked their opinions on what kind of monk an appropriate picture should be. In my efforts to answer, I've drawn this chart in D&D Beyond's suggested format. In it, the top row answers my personal preference for a monk's face, the bottom row answers the preference of the user communities I'm representing. To summarize, I'm looking for answers to the following questions: What does a "good-natured monk" look like, particularly a monk you want to be friendly, well-meaning, and well-intentioned? What do you dislike about the face and head of the monk in the top row of the chart above? What do you like about that face and head? I'd be interested to hear answers from experienced role-playing players and/or people in charge of creating these pictures for D&D Beyond, if it's relevant. A: I would like to start by saying that the appearance of a monk is not super important, as long as it fits within a specific genre. I've played D&D since its early 3.0 days. I've played other pen and paper games since 1987. I know I can handwave a monk away and come up with just about anyone. Still, I have a few thoughts: What does a "good-natured monk" look like, particularly a monk you want to be friendly, well-meaning, and well-intentioned? While I agree with everybody that what it looks like is secondary to what it is in terms of character, I'll take a stab and say that a friendly and well-intentioned monk would be someone with maybe a dark complexion, maybe with a beard, maybe short hair. Don't be afraid to take a few liberties. What do you dislike about the face and head of the monk in the top row of the chart above? To put it bluntly, I find that it looks so much more like the real world that way. There are so many different ways to do monks, that you'd have to be really keen on the art that they want to see. It also looks a bit squished to me. What do you like about that face and head? The fact that it's so real. I'd say that for this person, the face is closer to the rest of their face and more of their head (than the previous image) and that that head suits that face a bit more (than the previous head). The face is a little angular so that I can think of the person as intelligent, and I find that I don't mind it. 5ec8ef588b
