Free Online Download Full MovieTemporal processing of the flicker illusion in the visual system. In an experiment on the flicker illusion (the effect that the perceived flicker frequency of a stationary target is higher when there is a flicker at the same perceived flicker frequency), the luminance of the background of a moving target was modulated at a frequency close to but not exactly double the target's flicker frequency. A significant effect of modulation was found in contrast-defined patterns (i.e. luminance patterns). Modulation did not affect the contrast-defined patterns of a stationary target. The effect of modulation seems to be carried by the flicker components of the patterns. A theory of flicker vision is briefly outlined.Q: Choosing between tests in RSpec - tests that all pass but one I've got some methods that essentially do the same thing. I've split the methods up into several RSpec tests, and I'd like to be able to select which one I'd like to run with spec_helper. At the moment I have something like this in spec_helper.rb: RSpec.configure do |config| config.include Gem::Specification, :type => :feature config.include Test::Unit::TestCase, :type => :feature end But what happens if the method fails, and I want to test all of them? A: You can have the test run with multiple options (here's the link to the source) by adding something like this to your test_helper.rb file: describe "my_method" do it "should do something awesome" it "should also do something awesome" it "should also do something awesome" end The config.include line is also important, as you can see from the source: RSpec.configure do |config| # Include should be used to include spec files from your spec/ directory # in to the test output, but only if you are running the spec command # outside of the shell. # # It is not used if you are running it from RSpec. config.include File.expand_path('../spec/spec_helper
